

The Bolivian Climate Justice Movement: Mobilizing Indigeneity in Climate Change Negotiations

Author(s): Kathryn Hicks [1], Nicole Fabricant [2]

In: Latin American Perspectives, Vol 43, No 4, 2016, pp. 87-104

The authors note that many of the groups in the Bolivian coalition mobilizing against global warming draw on indigenous philosophy and worldviews to oppose value commitments to economic development. Drawing on fieldwork in 2010, they assess the relationship between state and non-state actors and argue that the coalition has had a significant global impact, despite the failure of multilateral climate change negotiations.

See also article by the same authors: 'Bolivia vs. the Billionaires: Limitations of the "Climate Justice Movement" in International Negotiations', Nacla: reporting on the Americas since 1967, Vol. 46, issue 2, 2013, pp. 27-31.
DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1080/10714839.2013.11722008> [3]

Examine's Bolivia's role at UN Conferences in Copenhagen and Doha and notes the strength of the opposition, not only from powerful global companies blocking real reduction of carbon emissions, but 'the capitalist economy itself'. They also discuss the World People's Conference in Bolivia in 2010 and report criticisms of Evo Morales reliance on extractive industries for economic development, despite his 'anti-capitalist discourse'.

Source URL (modified on 20/07/2020 - 17:17):<https://civilresistance.info/biblio-item/2016/bolivian-climate-justice-movement-mobilizing-indigeneity-climate-change>

Links

[1] <https://civilresistance.info/author/3200> [2] <https://civilresistance.info/author/3201> [3] <https://doi.org/10.1080/10714839.2013.11722008>