

The Peace Movement: The Beginning and End of Nuclear Disarmament Campaigning in Vancouver

Author: Christine Kim [1]

In: Hemishperes, Vol 40, 2017, pp. 57-74

In the last decade of the Cold War, during the 1980s, the Peace Movement in Vancouver, BC, gained an unprecedented amount of traction. However, was short-lived as peace activists dwindled in the 1990s and beyond. In this article Christine Kim explores what were the factors that caused the peace movement in Vancouver to fail and whether its legacy is one that supports the value of political activism as a powerful agent for change. The author interviews students, professors, and activists from the Vancouver Peace Movement of the 1980s in an hour-long radio documentary.

Source URL (modified on 09/06/2020 - 16:46):<https://civilresistance.info/biblio-item/2017/peace-movement-beginning-and-end-nuclear-disarmament-campaigning-vancouver>

Links

[1] <https://civilresistance.info/author/3052>